When one thinks of the political fallout of Snowden's revelations about government surveillance, one thing would seem to be an inexorable part of the calculus: the legal case against him. Yet much of the discussions of that subject have overlooked something of far greater importance — namely, the fact that the government has now made it a crime to leak classified information. It's an unprecedented attack on the First Amendment — a move made possible by very real history and a very real threat of prosecution. Although he's been living in Russia since then, the U.S. government could still charge him under the Espionage Act of 1917. The act of giving away information that is, to a greater or lesser extent, sensitive and potentially damaging is punishable by 10 years in prison, although, under the 1993 government-drafted law, there is a chance of parole after one year. Snowden's disclosures in the past month have exposed the extent to which the NSA is spying on the communications and activities of Americans and others throughout the world and the consequences of this. The revelations have arguably hurt the U.S. more than any other nation when it comes to attracting business and foreign investment and generating military contracts from international allies. But the U.S. government is also vulnerable legally, as former National Security Agency official Thomas Drake pointed out in an article for The Guardian in August 2008. Drake pleaded guilty and did time for trying to whistle-blow about lax defense contracting oversight in 2005. Drake's "doxxing" was a violation of the Espionage Act of 1917, according to a May 2009 Washington Post article. "The technology makes it possible to expose a person's identity through her computer and other digital devices. In such a case, a target is 'doxxed' when his name,
